DVDs are similar in size and appearance to a compact disc or CD-ROM. What makes them different is that they hold a lot more information than a CD, everything from massive computer programs to full-length movies. When DVDs were first being developed, different companies supported two different types of DVD technology. The DVD debate was similar to the VHS versus Beta battle for the video cassette recorder in the early 1980s. Developers were worried that the DVD market would be split in two, like the VCR market was. Naturally, computer companies demanded that DVD manufacturers agree on a single DVD standard. Eventually, ten of the world's biggest electronics, TV, computer, and entertainment companies worked together to create this DVD format and in September of 1995, they announced the creation of the new DVD format. Many experts believe the agreement between companies allowed for a better DVD because the strengths of the two technologies were combined.

Have you ever stood in the middle of a big city and looked up at the stars? I'll bet you didn't see very many, did you? The problem is that the lights of the city are brighter than the stars, so the stars become ( ① ). This problem is called "light pollution," and scientists are beginning to consider it a big problem.

In the city of Toronto alone, 24,000 birds light ( ② ) them. Also, near city beaches, baby sea turtles are ( ③ ) toward the street lights and getting killed by passing cars. The turtles believe the bright lights are the moon shining on the water, so they naturally go toward it. Doctors think that humans, too, are being affected by too much light. People who live in cities have much higher rates of sleeplessness, depression and breast cancer, compared to people who live in the countryside. Scientists warn that any changes to our world's natural rhythms will have a ( ④ ) disaster for the future- both for animals and for humans.

- ① (            )    ② (            )    ③ (            )    ④ (            )

1. Spielberg's films often deal with several *recurring themes. Most of his films deal with ordinary characters searching for or coming in contact with extraordinary beings or finding themselves in extraordinary circumstances. In an AFI interview in August 2000 Spielberg commented on his interest in the possibility of extra terrestrial life and how it has influenced some of his films. Spielberg described himself as feeling like an alien during childhood, and his interest came from his father, a science fiction fan, and his opinion that aliens would not travel light years for conquest, but instead curiosity and sharing of knowledge.

* recurring: 순환하는

2. A more modern modal description frequently used by Koreans divides the modes into two basic types, one *anahemitonic pentatonic(p'yŏngjo) and one of variously five, four and three notes(kyemyŏnjo). The five- and four-note kyemyŏnjo are used to describe certain pieces of court music, and the three-note kyemyŏnjo is used for folk music. Important characteristics of the folk kyemyŏnjo are a large vibrato on the note a 4th below the tonic and a slowly descending, drooping quality in the note a step above the tonic.

*anahemitonic: 무반음
